

Dr. Roopa Desai Trilokekar

Roopa's professional career has been focused on international education. She has worked in the U.S., India and Canada in various capacities facilitating international academic exchanges. Her attempts to bridge the gap between research, policy and practice, led to the publication of Canada's Universities Go Global (2009) along with Glen Jones and Adrian Shubert. She has worked on several publications with students/colleagues, as part of research projects, and examined the influence of national characteristics on higher education policy making, in particular internationalization policies. She is also equally interested in post secondary student's learning through international educational opportunities and resists the popular competency based learning model in favour of examining student's particular identities and locations in how they influence their international learning.
